The Argentine junta has made great strides in its antiterrorist campaign since seizing power last March. Since November, Argentine security forces have had spectacular success in their battle against leftist terrorists. Some 250 suspected subversives were killed in November and December, bringing the total of victims for 1976 to about 1,500. During the first week of the new year, 50 guerrillas have died in politically motivated violence with only one fatality reported among the security services.

Although most of the top guerrilla leadership has been wiped out and the terrorist movement fragmented, the dissidents are still capable of carrying out dramatic acts of violence, such as assassinations and bombings.

The government's success can be attributed in part to better intelligence that provides security forces with knowledge of the subversives' intentions and locations. As raids are carried out, documents exposing additional terrorist plans are seized.

Despite the success against the guerrillas, the junta is facing some disgruntlement. President Videla's release made upon the recommendation of the Army Chief of Staff -- of a large number of political prisoners before Christmas and the promotion of an army colonel to general have caused disaffection within the military and the federal police. Most officers reportedly opposed the detainees' release, believing that such an act permits some of them to resume subversive activities. Moreover, many army officers apparently disapproved of Videla's bypassing traditional promotion procedures in advancing Col Juan Alberto Pita. Although Videla's motive was probably to reward Pita for his recent escape after six months of confinement by terrorists, the officers reportedly considered the promotion unjust since many colonels had superior service records.

The military's displeasure over the President's moves is not sufficiently serious to bring about his ouster. Nevertheless, considering the economic, labor, and political pressures on the government, Videla and his closest advisers cannot afford to make more decisions that might erode the support they now enjoy within the army.
