(b)(3) 10 U.S.C. 424		1. (U) The Supreme Court reiterated its inability to resolve the cases of 1,542 disappeared persons due to the lack of information and cooperation of the Executive power, while at the same time acknowledging that such a situation constitutes a denial of justice. The December 21 ruling, in reply to <sup>the third</sup> Permanent Assembly for Human Rights petition signed by 1,221 persons <sup>recording</sup> on behalf of 1,542 documented cases of disappeared persons, was made public in early February. In its unanimous decision, the court called upon the Executive Power to make available sufficient information for the courts to resolve the habeas corpus petitions for disappeared persons in fulfillment of the court's responsibility to uphold the Constitution and individual liberties.
2. (U) Although the court declared itself not empowered to evaluate or emit opinions on "situations not commended to it by government," it noted the high number of cases in which habeas corpus petitions had to be rejected by the courts because of the reply of the Executive Power that it had no record of the individuals' detention. This fact, said the court, constitutes a situation "equivalent to the effective denial of justice for causes totally foreign to the special functions and competence of the judges, who do not have it within their power to remedy the situation." In order to permit the court to fulfill its mandate to safeguard individual liberties and uphold the Constitution, the court asked that the Executive Power "immediately take necessary measures to create the conditions required by the judiciary to resolve the cases, without intending, of course, to obstruct the objectives of national unity, internal peace and common defense."

3. (U) The Supreme Court's ruling got good press coverage, as well as a strongly supportive editorial in La Nacion Feb. 4. La Nacion sustained that "there is no political issue in Argentina today more important than that of guaranteeing individual security now that collective security has been assured." Peace has been attained by force of arms to the grateful relief of the population, said La Nacion. "However, it is not enough to win the peace; it is indispensable that it be guaranteed." The court has shown by its decision that it is alert and doing its part to achieve that fervently desired objective, said La Nacion.

4. (U) Justice Minister Varela pointed to the December 21 decision as proof that Argentina enjoys an independent judiciary in remarks made to the press Feb. 7. He said that several judicial reform measures are now being studied by a special three-man commission, among them an agreement with the Province of Buenos Aires which would greatly simplify and shorten inter-court procedures and could be followed in other provinces.

5. ~~(C)~~ COMMENT: The delicately worded decision, which virtually acknowledges the court's powerlessness to act in disappearance cases, was also well received by the Permanent Assembly for Human Rights. Publicly calling the decision a "comfort" to families of disappeared persons, a PAHR official told Emboff that the court has now put the burden of the disappeared "problem" squarely where it belongs--in the Executive branch. The government will not be able to hide the disappearances issue behind the courts and the legal system, he said, adding that PAHR was considering recommending the Supreme Court judges resign if the Executive refused to accord them the power to carry out their mandate. Justice Minister Varela's ingenuous remark that the ruling ~~will~~ will help improve the country's image as an example of the independence and power of the judiciary seems to have missed the high court's point altogether. What is noteworthy, however, is that a movement--perceptible in the more forthright press reports and editorials, the latest Supreme Court ruling and the awakening public ~~outrage~~ outcry against ~~xxof~~/abduction-murders--is steadily growing within Argentine ~~country~~ society to turn the ~~country~~ toward the rule of law.

END COMMENT.
