When the KGB discovered Shadrin was as a double agent operating against the Soviet Union, KGB leadership began an extensive plan to lure Shadrin to Vienna to meet a new KGB controller. During the rendezvous, KGB operations officers threw Shadrin into a car, en route for Czechoslovakia. The operatives likely injected him with a sedative so powerful that it killed him.

Shadrin, a Soviet navy commander, defected to the United States in 1959. He was working in DIA's Handbook Analysis Division of the Soviet Directorate, (cover name for the External Research Project, that produced a special weekly summary that went to the White House) but also supported the FBI as a double agent. warning. His naval experience, acute acumen, and dedication made him a key contributor to DoD's understanding of Soviet naval warfare capabilities, tactics, and limitations. Following the abduction, former DIA Director Lieutenant General Daniel Graham stated, "In the area of Soviet naval operations and doctrine, Shadrin was the best we had."
